Todd competed at the World Powerlifting Championship held at the River Palms Resort in Laughlin, Nevada, and won gold medals in both the men's open and master's competition. According to powerlifting officials, a competitive bench press is approximately 33% more difficult than the standard fitness club version. The difficulty results from the strict judging and rules of performance which require the weight to be held motionless on the chest until the referee gives the "press" command.

I was curious about his training regimen and I asked him how he managed to stay "competition ready" during busy season (which for tax, is eternal). He explained that he has converted his garage into a mini-gym. This makes it very convenient for his early morning 1-1/2 to 2 hour work-out sessions. He alternates his workouts (7 days a week - doubling up on Saturday) between lifting and cardio.
